In Spring 2017, Design in Mental Health launched a research brochure, showcasing key evidence relating to mental health and the built environment. In this more comprehensive review of the literature, we have assembled evidence from psychology, nursing, psychiatry, architecture and design, to explore the relationship between environments and people.

Design with People in Mind - DIMHN

People with lived experience work with staff to carry out research in order understand what is required for the project, this usually involves using additional Influence and Participation methods to gain a deeper understanding of what people with lived experience need and want; sometimes a Service Design methodology is used to give this structure. Work is then carried out by those involved to draft or design the 'product' that is required.
